Text 1

After a long drive, Ann and I reached the spot where the live action role-playing (LARP) game was going to take place. In the car, I'd had the time to outline to Ann the story conceived by our Game Master. As an already experienced LARP player, she quickly got the hang of it, although it was going to be her first game of Vampire: The Masquerade. My character had a pause for this episode, but due to the large number of non-player characters needed, I'd agreed to go and take Ann along to help stage the event. This time, we were both supposed to play some minor roles of modern teenagers and were allowed to wear some casual everyday clothes.

We reached the spot quite early, with ample time to take a stroll around the property so that Ann could get familiar with the setting. We left whatever little luggage we had in the car and first walked around the vast overgrown garden surrounding the old mansion. I could see Ann was impressed. Then we went inside the house. The interior, which must have once been lavishly decorated, was now falling into a state of disrepair, with paint falling off the walls and some broken furniture.

"How did you find this place?", Ann whispered as if afraid to speak out loud. "It's so atmospheric". I couldn't agree with her more. Despite its remote location that meant some of the players had to drive long hours to get there, a more suitable place to stage the event could hardly have been chosen. From the hall, we went upstairs to report to the Game Master and meet the others.

After some quick introductions, our part of the briefing began. The Game Master started by going through the game rules which defined the ways how the player and non-player characters should interact with each other. As a result of having been a player character in the other episodes, I was quickly given some individual instructions only needed for this particular game and was asked to leave the room so that I wouldn't find out too much about the future events of the plot. This was fine because I went downstairs to have some coffee and sandwiches before the game started. A few actual players were already there, so we had a chat while they were waiting for their individual briefings to take place.

- 1 From the first paragraph, we learn that Ann
- had never taken part in LARP events before.
 - hadn't been familiar with the plot of the game.
 - had participated in the earlier stages of the event.
 - had difficulty understanding the game system.
