Learning Dispositions

- 'The concept of a 'disposition' comes from developmental psychology. In everyday speech we often use it like 'temperament'; we comment that someone has 'a cheerful disposition'. It is seen as a quality of an individual, something he or she was born with, or an outcome of facilitating circumstances. When motivation is situated, however, as David Hickey points out, 'context has a fundamental, rather than merely a facilitative role' (1997, p177). Lilian Katz made this point when she commented that: Dispositions are a very different type of learning from skills and knowledge. They can be thought of as habits of mind, tendencies to respond to situations in certain ways (1998, p30, my emphasis).'
