Jean Edward Smith***

The German Democratic Republic is variously described as the last "Stalinist" state in Eastern Europe; the most repressive regime east of the Elbe; and Moscow's most docile satellite. To many it remains the Soviet zone of occupation. Its continued existence, we are told, depends exclusively upon the twenty Soviet divisions stationed within its borders. When it is referred to by spokesmen of the Western powers, the words "so-called" inevitably precede its national designation. In contrast to the Federal Republic of Germany it appears backward, sullen and resentful, a Marxist aberration on hallowed German soil. Its population has revolted twice: once actively in 1953; once silently with their feet until the Berlin border closure in 1961. The implication is that popular hostility is endemic. Industry is alleged to lag and agriculture to stagnate. Its leadership is regarded as the most pedantic and pedestrian in the lacklustre constellation of Eastern Europe. East Germany remains a transitory entity on the world scene, a relic of Soviet expansion from which the Russians will ultimately pull back. German unification, based on free elections, eventually will return a liberal, popular, Christian, and non-Communist government. Or so almost everyone expects.

The thesis of this article is that "times have changed" The model of Stalinism most frequently associated with the German Democratic Republic (GDR) has never had significant validity. For Stalinism, among other things, implies extreme police terror and capricious one-man rule. But since the inception of the GDR, Ulbricht has had to share his power: first with Pieck and Grotewohl; presently with Erich Honecker and the party bureaucracy on the one hand, and a rising class of managers and

Background notes, German Democratic Republic ,1982 Postwar History Education in Japan and the Germanys Julian Dierkes, 2010-12-14 How did East and West Germany and Japan reconstitute national identity after World War II Did all three experience parallel reactions to national trauma and reconstruction History education shaped how these nations reconceived their national identities Because the content of history education was controlled by different actors history education materials framed national identity in very different ways In Japan where the curriculum was controlled by bureaucrats bent on maintaining their purported neutrality materials focused on the empirical building blocks of history who where what at the expense of discussions of historical responsibility In East Germany where party cadres controlled the curriculum students were taught that World War II was a capitalist aberration In West Germany where teachers controlled the curriculum students were taught the lessons of shame and then regeneration after historians turned away from grand national narratives This book shows that constructions of national identity are not easily malleable on the basis of moral and political concerns only but that they are subject to institutional constraints and opportunities In an age when post conflict reconstruction and reconciliation has become a major focus of international policies the analysis offers important implications for the parallel revision of portrayals of national history and the institutional reconstruction of policy making regimes

Dictatorship, State Planning, and Social Theory in the German Democratic Republic Peter C. Caldwell, 2003-03-27 The introduction of state planning and party dictatorship dramatically altered the environment for social theory in the German Democratic Republic But social thought did not disappear By the mid 1950s East German social theorists discovered the basic contradictions of state socialism that would eventually lead to its collapse the inability of the plan to function without markets and its inability to permit markets the inability of the party state to guarantee the rule of law and yet also the need for a regular system of rules in a modern industrial society and the contradictory philosophical claims of a Marxist Leninist philosophy that rejected idealism and Marxist Leninist dogma with its idealistic claim to know the laws of social modernization Making use of archival sources Caldwell examines the articulation of these analyses their subsequent suppression by party authorities in the late 1950s and their return under the guise of cybernetics in the 1960s
