

Quick Guide to Citing Sources in Political Science Papers

When writing political science papers, you must cite the sources you use to construct and defend your argument. Often professors will either tell you a specific method to use (Chicago, MLA, etc.) or will allow you to choose your method as long as you are consistent. Do NOT make up your own method of citation – learning to use citation methods is an important skill to develop for your academic career. There are three standard methods of citation: in-text/parenthetical, footnotes, and endnotes. Your method choice will largely depend on the kind and number of sources that you are using.

In-text Citations

An in-text citation is a brief note on the source that appears in the text, providing immediate source information without interrupting the flow of argument. An in-text citation immediately follows the quote or other material to be cited. It should be placed after the end quote and before the period. It should appear in parentheses. It usually requires only the last name of the author(s), year of publication, and page or chapter numbers. If the reference is to the entire work as a whole, you can forget the page or chapter numbers. No comma separates the author and date, though a comma is typically used before the page number.

For example:

- “In the parenthetical, or author-date, reference system recommended in this manual, citations in running text consist of two basic elements—authors’ names and dates of publication—usually in parentheses” (Turabian 1996, p. 175).

This kind of citation is used most commonly in Political Theory papers, where you may refer to only one or two sources, and they are books or scholarly articles. In-text citation must be accompanied by a full bibliography so that the reader has access to the full citation information.

Footnotes and Endnotes

Footnotes are a small subscript number or system that lets the reader look at the source information either at the bottom of the page or at the end of the paper. Often numbers are used for footnotes, while Roman numbers are used for endnotes. Microsoft Word can automatically insert and place your footnotes for you, using the Insert menu.

For example:

- “Notes documenting the text, and corresponding to reference numbers in the text, are properly called footnote when they are printed at the foot of the page and note or endnote (sometimes backnote) when they are printed at the back of a book, at the end of a chapter, or at the end of an article in a journal.”¹

Footnotes and endnotes are useful when you use many varied sources, as parenthetical citation in this case can seem overly clunky and disrupt the flow of your paper. Endnotes are especially useful in ensuring that you are able to use the majority of your pages to present your argument rather than your sources (Most professors will not include footnotes/endnotes/bibliography in the page limit).
