

Process Versus Outcome Thought Focus and Advertising

Recent social psychological research demonstrates that certain types of mental simulations are particularly useful for helping individuals reach the things they covet (e.g., Taylor, Plana, Rivlin, & Armer, 1998). More specifically, Taylor's (1998, 1999; Taylor et al., 1998) recent research indicates that the most successful simulation focus on the process of achieving a goal rather than on the resources or outcomes of the goal. In this article, we extend simulations of persuasive versus outcome-focus and thought in advertising. In studies manipulating the focus of participants' thoughts while viewing a print advertisement, we find that process-focused thought results in significantly higher behavioral intentions than an outcome-focused thought when advertisement arguments are strong. However, in the case of weak advertisement arguments, process-focused thought actually lowers behavioral intentions compared to thoughts focusing on the end result or outcome of product usage. Thus, in addition to increasing the persuasive power of strong advertising claims, process-focused thinking appears to make individuals better or more discerning consumers who do not form behavioral intentions when it is inappropriate to do so.

In the popular press, self-help writers commonly advise people to simulate favorable outcomes and consequences to motivate successful achievement of individual goals (e.g., Penning, 1991; Potts, 1992). Some examples include visualizing one's self enjoying the benefits of losing at least one's financial goals or simulating one's self making the free throw shot that wins the basketball game (as reported in Imagining practicing free throw shots). Advertising also encourages consumers to simulate favorable outcomes of using products. A recent television advertisement for a luxury automobile was filmed from the driver's seat. The car is stopped at an intersection with a car next to it. The announcer says, "Imagine this is your only chance to make an impression. What type of impression would you like to leave?" In another advertising campaign, the California lottery encourages consumers to "Watch a little dream" of how they would spend their millions, were they to win. In these advertisements and many others, marketers encourage viewers to imagine positive outcomes of product usage.

Thus, in both the self-help domain and advertising, most instructions to simulate appear to focus on the enjoyment of achieved positive outcomes—on "eyes on the prize" focus. Recent research in social psychology, however, indicates that by focusing on the processes involved in goal-directed activities rather than on favorable outcomes, people are better able to achieve their goals (see the discussion of process-focused thoughts and its implications for the self-help literature provided in Taylor, Plana, Rivlin, & Armer, 1998). The purpose of this article is to explore the distinction between outcome- and process-focused mental simulations as a possible tool for designing persuasive advertisements. In applying this research to the advertising domain, we extend current literature on process-focused mental simulation by demonstrating that the strength of a persuasive communication moderates the effect of simulation type (process vs. outcome) on behavioral intentions.

The New Thought Movement in Healthcare Gabriel Andrade, 2025-05-17 This book delves into the evolution of the New Thought Movement and its pervasive influence on modern healthcare. The book begins by tracing the roots of the New Thought Movement originating in the 19th century, emphasizing the power of the mind in healing and personal development. Over time, this philosophy morphed into the contemporary positive thinking industry, becoming a significant component of Western self-help culture. The book explores how these ideas have become a contentious point in today's culture wars, polarized between supporters who credit it for personal empowerment and critics who highlight its limitations and potential harm. Central to the discussion is an in-depth analysis of the New Thought philosophy's impact on the healthcare industry. While acknowledging the potential benefits, such as motivating patients to adopt healthier lifestyles and fostering a sense of personal agency, the book critically examines how this philosophy's emphasis on mental positivity can lead to victim-blaming. It argues that oversimplifying health issues by attributing them solely to personal mindset obscures the multifaceted reality of health, particularly the significant role of social determinants of health and systemic inequities. This critique underscores how attributing illness to insufficient positive thinking can perpetuate stigma and neglect the socio-economic and environmental factors critical for understanding and addressing health challenges. By offering a nuanced perspective, the book aims to catalyze discussions on integrating mindful optimism with a holistic acknowledgment of the complexities inherent in healthcare, striving for a more balanced and equitable approach.

Higher Thought is a spiritual movement that coalesced in the United States in the early 19th century. New Thought was seen by its adherents as succeeding ancient thought, accumulated wisdom and philosophy from a variety of origins, such as Ancient Greek, Roman, Egyptian, Chinese, Taoist, Vedic, Hindu, and Buddhist cultures, and their related belief systems, primarily regarding the interaction between thought, belief, consciousness in the human mind, and the effects of these within and beyond the human mind. Though no direct line of transmission is traceable, many adherents to New Thought in the 19th and 20th centuries claimed to be direct descendants from those systems. Ruminative Thoughts Robert S. Wyer, Jr.,2013-01-11 Until recently most theory and research in social information processing has focused attention on the cognitive activity that underlies responses to stimulus information presented in the immediate situation being investigated In contrast people s thoughts outside the laboratory often concern life events that either have occurred in the past or are likely to occur in the future Thoughts about such past and future events can be spontaneous and once elicited can affect the ability to respond effectively to the demands of the present situation with which one is confronted This ninth volume in this series focuses on this type of cognitive activity and examines both its determinants and consequences The lead article by Leonard Martin and Abraham Tesser develops a theoretical formulation of ruminative thinking that conceptualizes rumination as a class of conscious thought with a common instrumental theme that recurs in the absence of immediate environmental demands The authors also give particular attention to the ways in which perceptions of the consequences of past and present events for long range goal attainment affect both controlled and uncontrolled thinking about these events They also examine the implications of their theory for the ability to suppress unwanted thoughts the interplay of emotion and cognition and the cognitive consequences or rumination for the performance of daily life activities The entire formulation integrates a number of cognitive phenomena that are not usually considered within a single theoretical framework The companion chapters many written by the field s foremost contributors to the literature on emotion and cognition suggest important refinements and extensions of the conceptualization proposed in the target article They also make important conceptual contributions in their own right covering topics that include the role of mental models in cognitive functioning the dynamics of thought suppression and attentional inhibition stress and coping personality correlates of ruminative thought and attitudes and persuasion As a result this volume makes a valuable contribution to research and theory not only in social cognition but also in numerous other areas Resilience After Pain Gabriel Barnes, AI, 2025-02-18
