

However, the term is not unanimously defined in the literature. The concept appears in an overlapping way with the notion text, and the two terms are even used synonymously. Yet at other places they convey contrastive shades of meaning (Károly, 2007). Widdowson (1996) applies the term text to the product of the process of discourse, de Beugrande and Dressler (1981) argue that a text is the product itself and the process as well. There is no consensus whether the terms mean written or spoken products either. Some linguists differentiate the two terms as a text being written while discourse being spoken (Coulthard, 1985; Sanders & Sanders, 2006). Nevertheless, others use both terms for written and spoken products (Ford et al, 2001; Trask, 1999). Some even argue that the terms discourse and text are such elemental and underlying ones that their nature cannot be defined categorically with certainty, which in turn might help new theories emerge relying on slightly different connotations of the terms (Kocsány, 2002). The present research follows the de Beugrandian tradition (1981) as far as treating the technical term text as a communicative event that is both a product and a process, as well as using the term discourse synonymously with text (de Beugrande, 1997). Considering the nature of communication, the current investigation is in the wake of Trask (1999) by applying the two compatible terms for written and spoken processes and products alike.

2.3 Genre and register

2.3.1 Genre and register as overlapping concepts

Certain instances of communicative events and a number of discourse samples or texts display several kinds of similarities. Based on these similarities, they might be labelled as belonging to one common class: a genre, traditionally a literary construct (Hyon, 1996), or a register. According to Swales (1981, 1986, 1990), whose research has been seminal in shaping genre theory, the crucial similarity that groups a pool of discourse items in a shared
