

II. Returns to schooling and the speed of reforms and macroeconomic disequilibrium

1. How cross-country variation in the growth of returns to schooling in transition economies can be explained by the speed of market reforms, initial conditions, and degree of macroeconomic volatility during the early reform period.
2. Reform progress is defined in terms of liberalization of prices and wages, private ownership, enterprise reforms, and the openness of the economy; used quantitative measures such as the proportion of GDP produced in the private sector and the share of foreign direct investment (FDI) in GDP as well as qualitative indices developed by the EBRD, such as the degree of price, wage and trade liberalization, large-scale privatization, and enterprise restructuring.
3. An overall measure of the speed of reforms, which is a composite of all seven reform indices and variables.
4. Transition approach
 - The big bang reform (CEER) vs growing out of the plan approach (China, where the Chinese Communist Party has retained political power throughout the econ transition).
5. In contrast to its relatively slow movement toward free markets, China experienced the most rapid economic growth among these transition economies.
