

The territory has a population of but 400,000 in an area of 29,388 square miles, yet its history touches the interests of many concerned with the Far East. Its very status is disputed by the Philippines, and Mr. Tregonning follows through the intricacies of the early treaties with the sultans of Sulu and Brunei. Merchants and adventurers, extending their activities both south from China and Hong Kong and east from Singapore explored the territory. The first cession was, in fact, made to an American trading company, later sold to Austrian and finally to British interests. Sir Walter Medhurst, retired from his consular duties, undertook labor recruitment. Ernest Major, the versatile Shanghai entrepreneur, introduced tobacco to North Borneo, and other Shanghai and Hong Kong capitalists invested in land companies in fits of excessive optimism and pure speculation. Disputes with Sarawak, Brunei, and the Dutch were typical of this period of imperialism. But perhaps the most important topic for students of general colonial history is that of the chartered company itself, the first—and to some extent the model—of those agencies by which Britain moved from the era of Free Trade to that of the New Imperialism.

The problems Mr. Tregonning discusses exist today—shortage of skilled labor, poor transportation in the interior, lack of crop diversification, and a railroad which might best be described as an experience. The personnel problem is somewhat easier now that the territory is a colony, but even with development funds and Colombo plans, revenue remains the limiting factor it was under the Chartered Company. The author's account of these practical economic and administrative problems should explain why development in the sense understood today was not possible in prewar Borneo.

Mr. Tregonning's work has, however, something of the bias of an official history. Thus he sides vigorously with the Company against the rajahs of Sarawak without considering the opposing, and equally convincing, point of view. A somewhat more complete account of the nongovernmental aspects of the territory, while beyond the author's intended scope, would have rounded out a story which is unlikely to be supplemented in the near future and on which the publishing industry can probably afford but one book.

The Organization of the Government of India.

By the INDIAN INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION. Bombay: Asia Publishing House, 1958. xii, 416. Rs. 20.

This new and important publication of the Indian Institute of Public Administration will be of interest to all concerned with government and economy in contemporary South Asia. Publication of this volume supplies us with the first manual of factual information concerning the administrative organization and major functions of any of the new South Asian governments. Systematic description of the machinery and purposes of the central agencies of Indian government was the intention of the Institute and this intention is largely met. For each of the ministries and departments there is presented a short historical statement, a concise report on organization and functions, and a note of the total number of civil servants employed by the ministry or department. Thirty organization charts are included.

Information valid up to March 1958 is provided. The Institute, recognizing the strong, continuous element of change in the administrative process, plans to issue new editions of this volume from time to time. While the initial edition has great merit as a pioneering product, succeeding editions can prove even more valuable. Statute law is of growing importance in Indian life and the sponsors of the volume will want to consider incorporating adequate reference to the central legislation underlying the creation and authority of administrative agencies. Certain major functions and projects of Indian government proceed today on the basis of statute, while other functions and projects lack statutory creation and authority. Interesting comparisons are becoming evident and a volume such as this deserves to notice even briefly the legislative background of administrative function. Again, the volume contains no budgetary information; summary data on appropriations made available to the ministries and departments should be included. Such information is essential in
