In Secret Robert William Chambers, 2020-09-28 The evening was becoming one of the coldest ever recorded in New York The thermometer had dropped to 8 degrees below zero and was still falling Fifth Avenue glittered sheathed in frost traffic police on post stamped and swung their arms to keep from freezing dry snow underfoot squeaked when trodden on crossings were greasy with glare ice It was also one of those meatless wheatless heatless nights when the privation which had hitherto amused New York suddenly became an ugly menace There was no coal to be had and only green wood The poor quietly died as usual the well to do ventured a hod and a stick or two in open grates or sat huddled under rugs over oil or electric stoves or migrated to comfortable hotels And bachelors took to their clubs That is where Clifford Vaux went from his chilly bachelor lodgings He fled in a taxi buried cheek deep in his fur collar hating all cold all coal companies and all Kaisers In the Racquet Club he found many friends similarly self dispossessed similarly obsessed by discomfort and hatred But there seemed to be some steam heat there and several open fires and when the wheatless meatless meal was ended and the usual coterie drifted to their usual corners Mr Vaux found himself seated at a table with a glass of something or other at his elbow which steamed slightly and had a long spoon in it and he presently heard himself saying to three other gentlemen Four hearts His voice sounded agreeably in his own ears the gentle glow of a lignum vitae wood fire smote his attenuated shins he balanced his cards in one hand a long cigar in the other exhaled a satisfactory whiff of aromatic smoke and smiled comfortably upon the table
