

Introspective and Retrospective Methods: Definitions, Advantages and Disadvantages

Introspection is the process of examining your own feelings and thoughts. It is a data collection method that draws heavily on one's self-reflection and has no relevance with the external observation. Introspective methods were first applied in cognitive psychology by Ericsson & Simon (1980) to obtain data on the way humans cognitively process information. Nunan (1992) defines introspection as "the process of observing and reflecting one's thoughts, feelings, motives, reasoning processes, and mental states with a view to determining the way in which these processes and states determine our behaviour" (p. 115). Cherry (2018) points out that "the term introspection can be used to describe both an informal reflection process and a more formalized experimental approach that was used early on in psychology's history". However, there are many methods that come under introspection. The chief among them are think-aloud protocol and diary study.

Think-aloud protocol, one of introspective methods, is a data collection method used in qualitative research. It is a research method in which a researcher asks participants to verbalize their thoughts, feelings, and opinions while they are doing a certain task. Mackey and Gass (2005) point out that the role of think-aloud protocol is to involve students in doing some tasks or problem solving activities and ask them to tell what is going in their minds while performing the tasks. However, while doing such problem activities, every student will use his own strategies to solve a problem; everyone will surely use a different way of manipulating it but often come to the end with the same solution. Nunan (1992) states that a researcher can gather a think aloud protocol by audio-recording it in order to be analyzed later for the thinking strategies. Think-aloud protocol helps researchers to obtain first-hand data spontaneously, in a short term memory. Cherry (2018) points out that the reflection of our thoughts, feelings, and memories as well as examining them means that we are involved in introspection.

Diary study is defined by Baily (1990) as "a first person account of language learning or experience, documented in a regular candid entries in a personal journal and analyzed for a recurrent pattern and salient events" (cited in Nunan, 1992, p. 120). Mackey and Gass (2005) explain that diary studies enable participants to write about their own language learning experiences. Participants often write about their
