Oils with lower SAE numbers within each of these two series are more fluid and flow more readily than do those with the higher numbers within the same series.

To determine if the oil in the compartments will flow in cold weather, remove the oil level gauge or dip a finger into the oil before starting and if the oil will flow off, the oil is fluid enough to circulate properly.

The oil that has been diluted for cold weather starting should be drained and replaced with undiluted oil at the end of the cold season when dilution is no longer required.

The oil specification chart will aid in the proper oil grade selection for the various compartments. The proper SAE grade of oil to select is determined by the atmospheric temperature at which the machine is started. However, during operation SAE 10W oil can be used successfully in the diesel engine crankcase when atmospheric temperatures are as high as 70° F.
