They wound down a deep cut in the hill and got a view of the lumber village their destination The roar of the waters tumbling over the granite rocks the rocks from which the village takes its name came up the ravine The broad river swept in a great semicircle to their right and its dark waters were flecked with the foam of the small falls near the village and the great cataract miles up the river It promised to be a perfect autumn day The sky which had seemed to Trenton overcast when they started was now one deep dome of blue without even the suggestion of a cloud The buckboard drew up at the gate of the house in which Mr Mason lived when he was in the lumber village although his home was at Three Rivers The old Frenchwoman Mason's housekeeper opened the door for Trenton and he remembered as he went in how the exquisite cleanliness of everything had impressed him during his former visit She smiled as she recognised the genial Englishman She had not forgotten his compliments in her own language on her housekeeping some months before and perhaps she also remembered his liberality Mr Mason she said had gone to the river to see after the canoe leaving word that he would return in a few minutes Trenton who knew the house opened the door at his right to enter the sitting room and leave there his morning wraps which the increasing warmth rendered no longer necessary As he burst into the room in his impetuous way he was taken aback to see standing at the window looking out towards the river a tall young woman Without changing her position she looked slowly around at the intruder Trenton's first thought was a hasty wish that he were better dressed His roughing it costume which up to that time had seemed so comfortable now appeared uncouth and out of place He felt as if he had suddenly found himself in a London drawing room with a shooting jacket on But this sensation was quickly effaced by the look which the beauty gave him over her shoulder Trenton in all his experience had never encountered such a glance of indignant scorn It was a look of resentment and contempt with just a dash of feminine reproach in it What have I done thought the unhappy man then he stammered aloud I I really I beg your pardon I thought the ah room was empty The imperious young woman made no reply She turned to the window again and Trenton backed out of the room as best he could Well he said to himself as he breathed with relief the outside air again that was the rudest thing I ever knew a lady to do She is a lady there is no doubt of that There is nothing of the backwoods about her But she might at least have answered me What have I done I wonder It must be something terrible and utterly unforgivable whatever it is Great heavens he murmured aghast at the thought I hope that girl isn't going up to the Shawenegan Falls Trenton was no ladies man The presence of women always disconcerted him and made him feel awkward and boorish He had been too much of a student in higher art to acquire the smaller art of the drawing room He felt ill at ease in society and seemed to have a fatal predilection for saying the wrong thing and suffered the
