How does thought latch onto reality? Our minds have the ability to reach out and refer to items in the external world. I can think about the tree outside my study window, say, or about Margaret Thatcher, or about solar neutrinos. But how is the trick done? How can my thoughts refer to things beyond themselves? We tend to take the mind's referential powers for granted, but they are enormously difficult to explain. Whole philosophical systems have foundered on the problem of understanding mental reference.

Many contemporary philosophers, in the English-speaking world at least, aim to explain mental powers in naturalistic terms. Minds are constituted by brains, say these naturalists, and brains are normal parts of the natural world. They can be understood like any other physical mechanisms, by using the methods of natural science to figure out their causal workings. In particular, say the naturalists, mental reference can be explained causally, in terms of the brain's causal relations to other parts of reality. I can think about the tree outside my window, for example, because my brain responds causally to the presence of the tree.

Different naturalists develop this causal approach to reference in different ways. Some focus on the biological design of the brain, appealing to the way brains have been shaped by natural selection to respond causally to features of the external world. Others emphasize how our mental intercourse with the world is often mediated by social interactions: I myself may have no direct causal contact with Margaret Thatcher, or indeed with solar neutrinos, but even so I am indirectly causally connected to these items, through my social relations to other people who do deal directly with them. Still, whatever the details of these different naturalist stories, they share a common theme. Mental reference is no unique mystery, but just another part of the causal world uncovered by natural science.

John Campbell is the Wilde Professor of Mental Philosophy at Oxford University, and he will have none of this naturalist orthodoxy. For Campbell, mental reference hinges on consciousness, not causation. Just having your brain causally linked to the world isn't enough. That won't tell you what the world is like, just as a blind person won't know what colours are like. The real basis for thought is conscious experience. I can think about the tree in my garden because I can consciously see it. True, I can also think about things that I have never perceived, like Margaret Thatcher or solar neutrinos. But this is a derivative matter, which would not be possible were I never in conscious perceptual contact with my local surroundings.

Campbell is here developing a distinctively Oxonian tradition. Nearly half a century ago
