

It might also be conjectured that migrants from overseas might experience disconnection from family and community networks as part of the process of adjusting to a new society and locating oneself in a new environment and community, and so affects their propensity to move. Bell and Hugo (2000) show that mobility rates amongst English speaking migrants tend to be higher than the Australian born population, but the reverse is true for those from other overseas countries. Mobility rates decline considerably the longer migrants have been in the country (even accounting for age structure effects). Even so, certain groups (Pacific islanders, Iraqis and Bosnians) have very high rates of mobility.

Economic factors

Whether a person or household moves will also be conditioned by economic factors – including the calculations about relative economic benefit on offer in relation to labour and housing markets in different locations.

Around 15 per cent of all workers in Australia are job mobile (move employer and or their locality at least once every year), and job mobility is higher for younger people.³ Many people, especially the young, also move location to undertake study or training in order to improve their prospects in the job market. These moves may entail residential moves especially if they need to move interstate or to another region. Bradbury and Chalmers (2003) found that 45 per cent of moves of income support recipients are within capital cities, 4 per cent were between capitals, 20 per cent were between capital and non-capital, and 31 per cent within non-capital regions.

Economic factors might be expected to be most acute for unemployed people who have the most to gain from relocation to areas of better employment prospects – indeed, they are more likely to move house than those employed. In the year 1995-96, 34 per cent of all unemployed people moved house compared to 18 per cent for all persons.

However households may weigh up returns from the labour market with whether any move results in an improved standard of living overall. This may include costs of living in the new location and whether there is access to affordable, or better value, housing. In this sense, wage signals or offers of employment may not mobilise labour if people are more attracted to areas of low housing cost. Table 1 shows that employment and training is actually less of a concern than reduction of costs (including housing costs) in many unemployed persons' calculations.

The more widespread the concern about housing costs, the more likely decisions might be made to move to areas of lower housing costs.

Marshall et al (2002 and 2004) find that for those welfare recipients moving from non-metro areas to the city (to Adelaide and Sydney), the key reason is for work, though this varied by benefit type and few nominated housing as a factor in moving. On the other hand, housing affordability is a significant reason for movement for income support recipients moving from Sydney and Adelaide to non-metropolitan areas (62 per cent of sole parents saw it as a key consideration), though lifestyle reasons and personal circumstances also guide their decision (see Table 2 below).

³ See ABS Labour Mobility (Cat 6209.0) February 2004. Around 25 per cent of 20-24 year olds are job mobile.
