This paper investigates the beneficial economic consequences and market and accounting based valuation effects of troubled debt restructurings (TDRs) in financially distressed debtor firms. Relying on the implications of prior research and extant valuation theories, some empirical evidence on the beneficial outcomes and informativeness of TDR is first provided; significantly positive restructuring interval excess returns and higher excess returns to subsequently consummated restructurings and subsequent survivors. The market reaction to "full-settlement" and "modification of terms" types of TDR are also measured to evaluate the consistency of the FASB's binary classification and recognition criteria with the market participants' assessments. Finally, a valuation model conditional on book values and earnings is used to test the value relevance of the reported financial statement bottom lines and TDR related disclosure. The findings suggest that modifications are at least as beneficial and informative as full settlements. Hence, the recognition of the reduction in the liability and the related gain in the financial statements of firms that undertake modifications would be more congruent with the valuation effects assessed by market participants.

1. Introduction

The Asian and the Russian economic crises followed by indications of a global slump as evidenced by the Enron, Tyco, Swissair, Sabena insolvencies on each side of the Atlantic have led to a debate on how to handle such failures: whether to bail them out by restructuring their debt or let them fail, as a lesson to over-zealous investors.¹ Such troubled debt restructurings (TDRs) have been acknowledged as viable, less costly alternatives to legal Chapter 11 reorganizations (see, e.g. Brown et al., 1993; Di Napoli et al., 1991; Franks and Torous, 1994; Gilson et al., 1990; Hamer, 1985). Furthermore, firms that announce their TDR intentions have different financial profiles than similar non-TDR firms (Aksu, 1994) and firms that have successfully consummated their restructurings exhibit different financial characteristics than bankrupt firms and unsuccessful TDR firms (Gilson et al., 1990; Hamer, 1985). Finally, prior market-based research has found that they exhibit different return patterns around the announcement of their TDR attempts (see, e.g. Aksu, 2001; Gilson et al., 1990). These findings imply that different stages and remedies for financial distress might have different valuation effects.
