Kant and Mill on Human Nature

In this essay I will argue that both Kant and Mill have opposing views on human nature, based on their views on how one should act in accordance with feelings; in consideration of this I will further state that Mill has a more accurate view of human nature. I will start by analyzing Kant and Mill's views on human nature. Then I will compare and contrast each view. Finally I will argue why Mill's view is more plausible in accordance with my views on human nature.

I will start with an analysis of Kant's views of human nature. Kant states that: "All philosophy insofar as it is founded on experience may be called empirical, while that which sets forth its doctrines as founded entirely on a priori principles may be called pure," (Immanuel Kant, p 1). From this quote, Kant is stating the importance of empirical knowledge in his conception of what is good (Immanuel Kant, p 1). Kant also states that all of moral philosophy should be founded on its purest part, meaning a foundation that is with a priori laws of rationality, laws that are prior to experience (Immanuel Kant, p 3). Thus Kant believes rationality is essential to morality and uses its conception in all aspects regarding morality.

Kant believes there is a good will, which is the motivation to do a moral act for its own sake and not under any law or compulsion from an emotional response (Immanuel Kant, p 7). Therefore, an action is not made to be morally good to Kant based on its effects or its motivation to achieve a particular end, but rather, for its display of being good in itself (Immanuel Kant, p 7). It seems clear to me that Kant is aware of human nature as emotional and without a good will
