INTRODUCTION

Engineering mechanics is the study of forces and their impact or effect on rigid bodies. This field of study is divided into two branches: a) statics and b) dynamics. Statics deals with the effect and distribution of forces on rigid bodies which remain at rest. It studies how a rigid body response to an external force being applied at rest, while dynamics deals with the motion of rigid bodies caused by the forces applied to them. This means how will a body moves after a force is being applied.

In this review material, topics discussed in statics are force as a vector, resultant of a force vector, equilibrium of forces, analysis of structure, friction, centroids, and moment of inertia.

Principle of Statics

Rigid body – a definite amount of matter where its parts are fixed in position relative to each other.

Force – an action that changes or tends to change the state of motion of a body (i.e., external effect of a force).

Forces impact a body externally and internally. Engineering mechanics focuses on the external effect of force to a body (tends to change or change the motion) while strength of materials focuses on the internal effect of force to a body (i.e., deformation, distort).

Force is characterized by a) point of application, b) magnitude, c) its direction.

Magnitude – is the amount, quantity or intensity of a force which is represented in terms of vectors.

Direction – is the direction of the line along which it acts and may be expressed as vertical, horizontal, or at some angle with the vertical or horizontal.

Point of application – is the point of contact between two bodies or the point where the force acts in the body.

Sense – is the way its acts along its line of action upward, downward to the right or left and its generally denoted by an arrowhead.
