

Making Schools Safe for All Students: Why Schools Need To Teach More than the 3 R's

Anne Wescott Dodd

How much will video cameras and police patrols help when a student feels like an outsider? When the family is dysfunctional or too busy to pay attention? When teachers stress more homework and higher test scores? When the vice principal is quick to assign detention or suspension without asking the student to explain his side of the incident? When classmates make fun of or bully him?

The Columbine tragedy focused attention on the problem of violence in schools and quickly led to increased security measures, ranging from requiring students and staff members to wear ID badges and locking extra outside doors to installing metal detectors and assigning police officers to patrol the grounds. Educators had to do something, of course, but will adopting practices common in prisons make schools safer or just more secure? And if these steps will fall short, what else can schools do?

Many people expressed surprise to learn the identity of the shooters at Columbine and in some similar tragedies because they had been reasonably good students without a long history of problems in school. That no one predicted such students might explode with such disastrous consequences suggests that perhaps teachers and peers really didn't know them well at all. Do we need to worry about where else such embers of violence might be smoldering unseen? It is hard to know, given too many large schools; teachers with too many classes and too many students to do more than stress the academics; a societal culture that seems to condone—sometimes even idealize—violence; and a public that demands higher account-
