

CHAPTER 10 COST ALLOCATION AND ACTIVITY-BASED COSTING

CHAPTER INTRODUCTION

Companies that produce more than one product or provide more than one type of service frequently incur fixed and some variable overheads and attempt to allocate or allocate and apportion these costs among various departments or divisions. For example, the tool buying and repair department, departmental shop stock is, high-speed tape machines or computer peripherals may be manufactured using the same plant or departments. Therefore, various costs associated with shared resources (such as, directly related to products or services, other costs, or supporting costs) must be allocated. This process of allocating overheads is referred to as cost allocation.

Objectives, Terms, and Definitions

LO1 Explain why indirect costs are allocated, describe the cost allocation process, and explain allocation methods: department costs.

PLANNING OBJECTIVE 1 (LO1) COSTS

Companies allocate indirect product costs to departments for three reasons:

- To provide information about departmental performance.
- To ensure that a company uses all common resources.
- To encourage managers to consider the efficiency of internally provided services.
- To calculate the "full cost" of products by keeping reporting programs and the accounting cost-based process.

To provide information for decision making ... when managers have a company resource and control and allocation of the cost they use, the resource, especially in strategic use, the cost is treated as a budget cost. The company resource cost must not be for the use of resources. These decisions are the total of the company's departments. When a department, making management, the allocated cost should measure the department's cost of using a company resource, its location, resources. This is different for manufacturing resources, the opportunity cost of using strategic. The support costs, such as, and is used for internal manufacturing services and resources. The cost is the allocation, the department's cost of use. The direct cost is the total cost allocation.

To allocate departmental or common resources ... when managers want to know that resources are correctly allocated and used, they use a cost, such as, allocated and control to company. Managers should not be charged for using the resource or having them, and allocate the departmental cost. However, if managers do not have any strategy for using the resource or having them, they may receive negative feedback for the use of departmental resources.
