Abstract

Transnational Corporations (TNCs) exploit natural resources, whether renewable as in the case of forests, fisheries and agricultural products or non-renewable as in the case of minerals or petroleum, in developing countries through their subsidiaries. TNCs' exploitation of forests and acquisition of intellectual property rights in plants and animal breeding, based on the traditional knowledge of indigenous peoples developed over millennia, are in conflict with the rights of indigenous peoples to their territories, resources and traditional knowledge. TNCs also profit from conflict by trading natural resources that prolong wars; colluding with repressive governments to pervert political processes within a State; aiding and abetting crimes against humanity; and flagrantly violating human rights. This article explores the areas of conflict outlined above and examines the efficacy of the mechanisms for the control of TNCs whether legally binding or not. It is suggested that the only effective way of making TNCs accountable for their human rights violations and aiding and abetting crimes against humanity is the establishment of an international court with jurisdiction over corporations.

Keywords: transnational corporations, natural resources, conflict, corporate social responsibility, international law

1. Introduction

The history of Transnational Corporations (TNCs) is the history of exploitation of natural resources in developing countries and conflict and the failure to make TNCs accountable for collusion with repressive governments to pervert political processes within a State, egregious breaches of human rights and aiding and abetting crimes against humanity.

TNCs, that is, corporations whether incorporated or state-owned, which own or control production or service facilities outside the country in which they are based are not recent post-World War II creation as some theorists suggest (Vagts, 1970). The first TNC was the Dutch East India Company (or Vereenigde Oost-Indische Compagnie (VOC)) founded in 1602. The company was responsible for the Batavia Massacre of 1740 during the Chinese uprising over prices of sugar. In 1798, the company, weakened by internal deficiencies in the face of its competitors, notable among which was the British East India Company, was dissolved (Kelly, 2018).

The quest for natural resources by European powers in order to benefit the home countries led to widespread colonial activity during the Age of Discovery or the Age of Exploration (early 15th century to early 17th century) and after. For each possession acquired there was a corporation established as an instrument of annexation such as the British East India Company (the largest), Hudson Bay Company and the National African Company founded in 1879, to mention a few. In 1886 the National African Company was granted a Royal Charter under the name of Royal Niger Company, Chartered and Limited, which authorised the Company to administer the district obtained by cession and to exercise sovereign rights over the Protectorate of Northern Nigeria but with the proviso that "[t]he Company shall always be and remain British in character and domicile; and shall have its principal office in England ... and all Directors shall be natural born British" (Cook, 1964; Elias, 1967). It is worthy of note that limited liability was introduced by the Limited Liability Act 1855 and TNCs' accountability for their wrongs is based on the concept of corporate personality – that a corporation is a legal persona (a legal personality) distinct from the personalities of persons who constitute it – enunciated in 1897 in the decision of the House of Lords in the United Kingdom in Salomon v Salomon & Co (Note 1). On 1 January 1900, the
