Self-managed learning entails self-directed learning, action learning, and self-development. In 1978, Ian Cunningham defined the term self-managed learning and since then it has gained popularity among students who until today are increasingly adopting the concept (Serpis et al., 2017). The approach is divided into two different aspects; the first one is the learning group and has children with similar learning goals and of the same age. The second one is the learning agreement and it primarily entails discussions between a support group and a student. The learning group mainly depends on a facilitator to guide students concerning different topics. Groups are essential because they hone a student's ability to think critically because they are able to share possible goals and outcomes. On the other hand, the learning agreement has five components that it requires students to conduct. In this case, they should know their past, their present, their future, how they plan to reach this future, and the knowledge of whether they have achieved a particular goal. The paper aims at demonstrating the experiences of a financial analyst in relation to self-management learning.

The main focus of self-managed learning is on how efficient the process of learning is without considering its content. According to studies, the process is divided into five sections including autonomous learning, motivation learning, collaborative learning, strategic learning, and Meta-learning (Serpis et al., 2017). All these approaches of evaluation facilitate the learning process to help students develop in their future careers. According to research, Meta-learning eases fundamental alterations in
