

Retail companies spend nearly $20 billion on energy each year⁶. Energy represents a significant part of retail operating costs, and a 10% decrease in energy costs equates to an 8% increase in sales per square foot.

This paper describes how retailers can begin to implement sustainability best practices within their organization, and details proven strategies that can help organizations reduce their energy costs by 10–30%.

Drivers for energy and sustainability management

Increased requirement for transparency

Retail customers want to know more about the brands they buy, and are pressuring retail organizations to reveal more about the specifics of their manufacturing and operations processes. Non-governmental organizations (NGOs) such the Global Reporting Initiative are demanding that retailers better disclose and manage the energy and environmental impact of their facilities, their suppliers, and their products. Retailers are examining their supply chains to identify risks such as conflict minerals, resource scarcity, and human rights concerns. They are also identifying opportunities to improve sourcing, to minimize supplier disruption risks, and to enhance product design.

For retailers that conduct business in a sustainable manner, transparency can go a long way in building positive relationships with stakeholders and in proactively bolstering consumer confidence.

Declining sales and foot traffic, higher mobile commerce

Consumer buying habits are evolving, and mobile commerce is forecast to reach 17–21% of total retail sales by 2018⁷. As adoption of mobile commerce increases, many retailers are experiencing declining foot traffic in their stores, and lower sales volumes (a 5% sales productivity decline in the 5 years between 2008 and 2010).⁸

Physical store locations will remain an important channel in the future, but with sales per square foot expected to decline while costs remained unchanged, retailers are focusing on better integrating both physical and virtual channels. Channel integration helps to enhance the buyer experience by linking both the online and in-person shopping experience. Those retailers who are unable to fully integrate their physical store and virtual store strategies are at higher risk of lower sales and profit.

Unique Retail requirements

Energy and sustainability management planning requires a unique approach for each individual organization and does not lend itself well to a “one-size-fits-all” model. Retailers face unique challenges that affect the planning and deployment of sustainability and energy management programs.

Global footprint, multiple stakeholders - Global retailers are spread across a wide range of locations and cultures. They manage a host of differing constraints at the global, regional, and local levels. The sustainability and environmental teams, procurement, retail and facilities personnel, energy managers, operations personnel, store managers, and store employees all influence the effectiveness and success of energy and sustainability programs. Programs cannot simply be mandated; they need to be adopted across all levels of the organization, and robust change management strategies must be in place to drive and sustain the
