

What is an environmental sanitarian?

You may have heard the term, seen a job announcement, or read an article describing someone working as a "sanitarian." Many people assume that sanitarians are the folks who collect the garbage every week, or make sure that public buildings are kept clean. While these jobs are a very important part of proper sanitation, a sanitarian is a person who is an expert in public health and sanitation.

Back in 1855, a man named John Snow proposed the revolutionary idea that a cholera epidemic occurring in London might be related to a contaminated well that people were drinking from. Authorities were reluctant to believe him until they put a lock on the well and the cholera epidemic went away. Since that time Snow's idea, that maintaining a healthy community can directly affect the incidence of disease, has become a founding principle of public health. Sanitarians are the modern-day John Snow's, working to prevent you from getting sick because of your environment.

What do environmental sanitarians do?

You probably already have some idea of what an environmental sanitarian does, but you may call them "health inspectors." In the media, environmental sanitarians are usually shown inspecting restaurants for pests, rotting food, or food service workers with poor hygiene. Most of the day-to-day inspections are not always as dramatic or funny. While environmental sanitarians do look for the things shown in the media, they also make sure that restaurants store and prepare the food properly and take time educate food service workers about food safety. (The same food safety principles are also important in your own home. Check out the Food Protection section of our website for more information about what you can do to ensure your food is safe.)

While food protection is one of the most well-known functions of an environmental sanitarian, there are many other parts to the job. Environmental sanitarians are involved in so many things there is simply not enough space to cover all of it here.

Local environmental public health (EPH) practitioners are responsible for a comprehensive and diverse set of services and activities. Larry Gordon, the former president of the American Public Health Association (APHA), defines the practice of local environmental public health in this way:

"Environmental public health practitioners are involved not only in inspections, but perhaps more importantly in surveillance, warnings, permitting, grading, developing compliance schedules and variances, risk assessment, risk communication, public information, exposure evaluation, seeking injunctions and other legal remedies, embargoing, sampling for analyses, education, consultation, community networking, problem prioritization, policy development, marketing the values and benefits of environmental public health, plan and design review and approval, and epidemiology."
