PROBLEM: The family members of adolescents diagnosed with disruptive behavior disorders (DBDs) experience profound stress and burden. Despite the need for empirically supported interventions that address the challenges faced by these family members, few such interventions are available.

METHODS: In this qualitative descriptive study, we conducted in-depth interviews with 15 families of adolescents diagnosed with DBD. We asked the family members to identify what types of mental health services they needed and to describe the "ideal" program that would best address their concerns.

FINDINGS: Family members identified several intervention modalities that would fit their needs, including multifamily groups, family therapy, individual therapy, and community-based hotlines. They indicated that programs should address the following topics: family communication, conflict resolution, education about DBD, and strategies to improve interactions with child service agencies.

CONCLUSIONS: Clinicians should recognize that all family members may need support to manage the stressors associated with caring for or living with adolescents with DBD. When working with families, clinicians should provide information about the etiology and management of DBD, help navigate interactions with child service agencies, and employ strategies to improve family communication and functioning.

Disruptive behavior disorders (DBDs) are mental disorders of childhood that are associated with profound negative effects for the children and their families. DBDs include oppositional defiant disorder (ODD) and conduct disorder (CD) (American Psychiatric Association [APA], 2000). According to the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Fourth Edition, Text Revision (DSM-IV-TR), ODD includes a pattern of negative, hostile, and defiant behaviors (APA, 2000). This disorder is manifested by loss of temper, arguments with adults, refusal to comply with adult rules and requests, deliberately annoying people and/or blaming them for one's behaviors, being easily annoyed by others, being angry and resentful, and/or spiteful or vindictive. The DSM-IV-TR indicates that CD includes a repetitive and persistent pattern of behaviors that violate the rights of others or major social norms. The disorder is manifested by aggression, property destruction, dishonesty or theft, and/or serious rule violations (APA, 2000).

DBDs are the most common causes of child referrals to outpatient clinics and inpatient psychiatric hospitals (Merikangas et al., 2011). DBDs are associated with significant functional impairments; poor school performance, truancy, and school dropout; disturbed relationships with peers, family, and adults in authority; high rates of drug and alcohol use; and high rates of involvement with the legal system (Heflinger & Humphreys, 2008; Petroski & Tremblay, 2009). DBDs often co-occur with attention deficit/hyperactivity disorder, depression, anxiety, and learning disorders (Hamilton & Armando, 2008; Heflinger & Humphreys, 2008). In the United States, the lifetime prevalence rates of ODD and CD are 5.5 and 2.2%, respectively (Merikangas et al., 2010). DBD affects more males than females (APA, 2000; Merikangas, Nakamura, & Kessler, 2009), and the severity of illness worsens as the child ages.

Children who have been diagnosed with a mental illness are typically the focus of research, and few studies have been
