

Models

- A representation of something that may be used in place of the real thing, abstracting away unimportant features but retaining the essential. (Cooper).
- A good model is complete (does not abstract out important properties) and faithful (does not introduce features that are not in the original) with respect to its specific purpose. Helpful for understanding a complex system – cognition for the case of cognitive science.
- Computational cognitive modelling is the development of computer models of cognitive processes and the use of such models to simulate and predict human behaviour.
