Product design management: an annotated bibliography

Patrick Noon and Timothy Warner,
Gower, Aldershot, Hants, UK (1988)
212 pages, £25.00

The title of this book provides a precise description of its contents. A total of 710 references are listed, most with a brief indication of the topics that each addresses. The book is divided into 11 sections which have been chosen with some skill — the usefulness of a bibliography depends to a large extent on the logic behind the grouping of references. By and large, these references are where one would expect to find them.

The section headings start with 'Design management: issues and arguments' and move on to cover design and competitiveness, corporate strategy, corporate identity, legal aspects, managing design (subdivided into various key activities), design education and industry and, finally, insights into design techniques for managers. Perhaps this section should be at the beginning of the book. Placing it at the end seems to reinforce the notion that whilst managers must do better at managing design, they needn't be expected to know very much about the methods and processes of design.

In their introduction, the authors say that their aim has been to bring together the growing amount of literature on the subject of design management. Intentionally, only product work is considered, not graphics, packaging or other specialisms — this seems unnecessarily restrictive since there are many overlaps and common principles. However, within their brief, they have done a good job; this reviewer can see no significant omissions of publications available at the time the bibliography was compiled. If anything, there has been insufficient pruning of dated or inconsequential items — but the nature of the bibliography is that it is intended to be a listing rather than a critical appraisal of sources; even the most obscure reference might be enlightening to someone.

Who might that someone be? The book is "intended to be relevant to designers, managers, and teachers and students of the management of design". Certainly, every serious student of design or business ought to spend some time considering the management of design and this book represents an excellent starting point. For that reason, it would be disappointing if it did not find its way into most libraries in further and higher education.

Design strategies in architecture: an approach to the analysis of form

Geoffrey H Baker, van Nostrand
Reinhold, New York (1989) 285 pages

This clearly written and well illustrated book includes two main parts, each with several sections. The first part presents the author's viewpoint on architecture, which he interprets as a unique cultural and historical product that is different from other aesthetic artefacts. Baker maintains that the study of extant buildings and settings can help to identify the underlying principles of geometrical and symbolic orders. He claims that buildings ought to respond to the site conditions, functional requirements and the culture of those who inhabit them. The second part presents and applies an analytical method for the study of extant townscapes and individual buildings. This method is meant to discover the primary spatial (e.g., visual and volumetric), the functional (e.g., circulation) and the structural parameters inherent in the built environment. Baker states that these parameters are examined with reference to the purposes of buildings and "the kind of symbolic imagery which the building seeks to express" (p 64). Where appropriate, Baker notes that cultural, technological and economic factors ought to be examined.

The analytical studies presented in part two are grouped into four concerned with townscapes (including the monastic complex at Assisi, Italy; Warkworth, England; the Campo and Cathedral of Siena; and the Piazza San Marco in Venice) and those concerned with buildings (including the Town Hall at Saynatsalo by Alvar Aalto; the Athenaeum at New Harmony, USA; and the project for an extension to the National Gallery in London by James Stirling). The presentation of these examples confirms that Baker is much more concerned with the visual composition of the built environment, especially its volumes, geometric layout, visual sequences and pedestrian paths, than with the cultural, technological and economic factors he treats in a cursory fashion. In my opinion, this is disconcerting, because the method of study he proposes does not extend (or even acknowledge) the seminal contributions of authors such as Gordon Cullen¹. Moreover, Baker's approach tacitly accepts that the human experience of the built environment can be studied in terms of visual perception: concurrently he ignores the auditory, olfactory and tactile experience of places, which are important in each of the historical settings he examines in part two. Baker's method also overlooks much recent contemporary research by architects, archaeologists and historians who have developed methods for the study of the spatial organization of the built environment². While some of these contributions are more exhaustive than that proposed in this book, I think it is fair to claim that no comprehensive analytical method for studies of the built environment
