Abstract: Visible and near-infrared (VIS-NIR) spectroscopy is extensively used in the field of soil science to predict several soil properties, mostly in laboratory conditions. When measured in situ, contact probes are used, and, very often, time-consuming methods are applied to generate better spectra. Unfortunately, spectra obtained by these methods differ greatly from spectra remotely acquired. This study tried to address this issue by measuring reflectance spectra directly with a fibre optic or a 4" lens on bare untouched soils. C, N content and soil texture (sand, silt, and clay) prediction models were established using partial least-square (PLS) and support vector machine (SVM) regression. With spectral pre-processing, some satisfactory models were obtained, i.e., for C content ( $R^2 = 0.57$ ; RMSE = 0.09%) and for N content ( $R^2 = 0.53$ ; RMSE = 0.02%). Some models were improved when using moisture and temperature as auxiliary data for the modelling. Maps of C, N and clay content generated with laboratory and predicted values were presented. Based on this study, VIS-NIR spectra acquired with bare fibre optic and/or a 4" lens could be used to build prediction models in order to obtain basic preliminary information on soil composition at the field scale. The predicting maps seem suitable for a fast but rough field screening.

1. Introduction

Visible and near-infrared spectroscopy (VIS-NIRS) is a rapid and non-destructive analytical technique that is extensively used in the agricultural sector [1]. The method is easy to use and allows the user to correlate reflected light with the soil's chemical and physical properties [2]. The absorption in the NIR region is related to molecules that contain strong bonds between light atoms, such as C, H, O, and N. The method is both quantitative [3] and qualitative [4]. The predictions obtained by VIS-NIRS can be very accurate [5], and they thus allow for very precise mapping [6]. Moreover, they can often replace standard laboratory analyses [7]. The rise in the number of soil monitoring worldwide has triggered an important need for fast soil analyses, ideally in situ. Bulking soils to obtain a representative sample causes a loss of spatial information. There is, therefore, an urgent need to develop fast analytical methods that could also reduce analytical costs, thereby allowing an increase in the number of analysed samples.

VIS-NIRS is usually used under controlled laboratory conditions [8–10]. It is fast in comparison to classical analytical methods and is also environmentally friendly. However, building a laboratory-based spectral collection is still a laborious task due to the process of sampling preparation, i.e., drying, grinding, and sieving. The sample preparation stage is used to remove the influence of moisture content and soil structure. Sample preparation also makes the prediction models more accurate [11].

Not taking into account remote sensing, there are two possibilities to acquire field spectra: (i.) by using a mobile platform (i.e., Quraishi and Muazen [12], Knadel et al. [13]) or
