Abstract

Indonesia rice policy has been going through many changes and experiment since its independence in 1945. Even though development through rice is the most significance, there have been some challenges to economic agents. This essay is trying to capture the agricultural economic policy from time to time and the consequences each agents have to bear. The government often face dilemma whether to please farmers or to please consumers, to choose self-sufficiency or price stability. As a strategic commodity, rice also acts as a tool for the government in power to be re-elected. Rice is not only an economic commodity, but also political. If the government cannot control prices, social-political conditions are easily shaken. The government's legitimacy ruling disrupted. This essay provides information of rice policy throughout Indonesian history from independence to current government, seasoned with a little bit of politics.

Rice Policy In Indonesia:

Rice Policy in Indonesia Scott R. Pearson, 1991 This book examines the components of Indonesia's rice policy to help policymakers, analysts, and observers sort out the pros and cons of alternative courses of action. Containing the results of the Food Research Institute's third multiyear research project on Indonesian food policy, the book combines new field-based empirical evidence on rice farming profitability and rural employment and wages with long experience in analyzing Indonesian food policy issues and the international market for rice. Rice Policy in Indonesia Saleh Affiff, C. Setting aside some backsliding resulting from the Covid-19 pandemic, Indonesia's poverty reduction journey has come a long way since the Asian financial crisis to less than 10% by 2019. Likewise, meaningful progress has been seen in daily calorie consumption and a declining stunting rate. But despite these gains, many challenges are evident. On the production side, agriculture struggles to promote productivity, community livelihood, and sustainability, a challenge made more pronounced by increased extreme weather events, climate change, and emissions. Meanwhile, on the consumption side, not everyone enjoys access to food and nutrition security equally. Modernizing agriculture is seen as a potential response to challenges in agriculture. Increased investment in agricultural mechanization and digital technologies provides a critical avenue to transform the sector into a more inclusive, efficient, and sustainable system. With the expected increase in productivity and income, including for smallholder farmers, agricultural modernization will help Indonesia's economy structurally transform and finally shift off-farm toward higher-paying, higher-productivity sectors outside of agriculture. The challenges facing Indonesia's food security and modernization efforts in agriculture set the broad context for this book. While solutions to food insecurity are complicated and involve many stakeholders, this book focuses on optimizing the private sector's role in improving food security. The Center for Indonesian Policy Studies (CIPS) has gathered expertise on a range of topics related to improving Indonesian agriculture and food security and the private sector's contribution. CIPS is an independent, non-profit, non-partisan think tank advocating for practical policy reforms informed by evidence-based policy research and analysis. CIPS presents this book as part of its commitment to empowering Indonesians to lead prosperous and peaceful lives by supporting open food trade and agriculture markets to ensure food security and sustainable livelihoods.
