

article in Canadian Slavic Studies, 4, no. 2, pp. 300-326, for example) and even achieve a kind of consensus about the universal validity of certain sociopolitical, socioeconomic, or sociopsychological processes in the study of sectarianism. The book says nothing about the future of such studies, but there must be one. And if A. I. Klibanov can publish such a book as this—fragmentary and tantalizing though it is—we in the West should no longer be left in the position of asking ourselves, What will Klibanov tell us next year? We should be allowed to conduct field work with our Soviet colleagues. Until that day, this reviewer can only say: Ktozna!

ISTORIYA I ORGANIZATSIYA ARKHIVNOGO DELA V SSSR (1917-1945 GG.). By V. V. Maksakov. Edited with an introduction by Yu. F. Kononov. Moscow: "Nauka," 1969. 431 pp. 127 rubles.

The impressive development of archives and of a sophisticated administrative apparatus to insure the control, preservation, and use of documentary records in the Soviet Union has generally not received the attention it deserves. This volume stands out as the most comprehensive account available of the formative period of the Soviet archival system, but disappointingly fails to assess adequately the significance of the Soviet achievement.

Maksakov deals with the subject chronologically, and in the first part of his book incorporates a slightly re-edited version of his earlier work, Arkhivnoye delo v pervye gody sovetskoi vlasti (Moscow, 1959). He covers such subjects as the formation and development of the State Archival Fund to include the entire national documentary legacy, the successive executive agencies for the administration of archives, the evolution of central and regional state repositories, the development of Communist Party archives, documentary publication projects, and aspects of archival training and national congresses. On all of these subjects the volume brings together much factual material, but it reads like an official text for the Moscow State Historical-Archival Institute, where the author taught for thirty years.

Associated throughout his life with the administration of Soviet archives and the training of archivists, V. V. Maksakov (1886-1964) was in a unique position to explore this topic. Yet this book, published posthumously under the editorship of Yu. F. Kononov, suggests an author too involved with the administration and factual complexities of his subject to offer many insights that would put the often confusing details into historical perspective. For example, Maksakov discusses at length Lenin's decree calling for archival centralization in 1918, but reveals much less about its intellectual origins than S. O. Shmidt does in his recent article in Problemy arkhivovedeniia i istorii arkhivnykh uchrezhdenii (Leningrad, 1970, pp. 19-35).

The author chronicles the many changes in archival nomenclature and organization in the years from 1917 to 1945, but he gives little analysis of the reasons for them. Too often Maksakov summarizes successive archival decrees or official pronouncements as if in a vacuum, without explaining their general purpose, the extent of their implementation, or their practical effects on previously existing institutions or administrative practices.

The 1945 cut-off point for the study appears somewhat artificial, because the major archival reorganization of 1941, the treatment of which is regrettably sketchy,
