

Abstract

This research centres on the implementation of settlement policies guiding the creation of agricultural dwellings in the countryside. The research methodology employed different theoretical perspectives which sought to recognise the complex and often contentious nature of policy implementation and the key role played by particular actors. The policy framework is characterised as possessing deficiencies attributed to the origins of the policy as an uneasy compromise between the interests of agriculture and other claims on the use of the countryside.

The research shows that in practice a significant proportion of applications for agricultural dwellings did not meet clear policy criteria. However, the overwhelming majority of such applications were nonetheless supported by councillors, often to the extent of overturning recommendations for refusal on policy grounds. Particularly prominent in that decision-making role were those rural councillors from an agricultural background who shared similar "interests-in-land" as applicants and who exercised a disproportionate influence in the determination of such applications. Such interests of the agricultural landowner were found to be in conflict with the officer interpretation of the "public interest".

Recommendations from the research include increased third party involvement in decision-making, tighter monitoring of decisions considered contrary to policy and further liaison between academics and practitioners in analysing the impact of land use planning. © 1997 Elsevier Science Ltd. Village Housing Nick Gallent, Iqbal Hamiduddin, Phoebe Stirling, Meiling Wu, 2022-10-17 Village Housing explores the housing challenge faced by England's amenity villages rooted in post-war counter-urbanisation and a rising tide of investment demand for rural homes. It tracks solutions to date and considers what further actions might be taken to increase the equity of housing outcomes and thereby support rural economies and alternate rural futures. Examining past current and future intervention, the book's authors analyse three major themes: the interwar reliance on landowners to provide tied housing and post-war diversification of responses to rising housing access difficulties including from the public and third sectors; recent responses that are community-led or rely on flexibilities in the planning system and actions that disrupt established production processes including self-build, low-impact development and a re-emergence of council provision. These responses to the village housing challenge are set against a broader backdrop of structural constraint rooted in a planning-land-tax-finance nexus and opportunities through reform to reduce that constraint. Village Housing makes the case for planning-land and tax reforms that can broaden the social inclusivity and diversity of villages supporting their economic function and allowing them to play their part in post-carbon rural futures. It aims to contribute greater understanding of the village housing problem framed by the wider cost crisis afflicting advanced economies and offer glimpses of alternative relationships with planning and land.

Countryside Planning Andrew Gilg, 2002-11-01 Should rural Britain be preserved from urban development or should people be allowed to live and shop where they want? In the face of continued urban expansion, the countryside has become a major issue, its future development uncertain. Countryside Planning addresses these concerns and provides an in-depth study of the rural debate. Beginning with the key concepts and issues, the author sets out the context in which planning operates and how society has constructed its own images of the countryside. Using three theoretical perspectives, the book describes the evolution of the current planning system and provides a basis for further discussion about the possible future for the countryside. In the wake of the recent Rural White Paper, the book includes the major issues that affect contemporary rural Britain, including the current reforms of the CAP, the role of farmers as land managers and the hypocrisy of sustainable and green tourism. Using boxed policy summaries throughout the text, as well as key question and answer sections in every chapter, the author treats policy and trends across the whole spectrum of countryside planning. Countryside Planning is an in-depth and authoritative analysis of rural policy and makes an important contribution to the countryside planning debate and the future of rural Britain.
