This paper reviews the progress of rural development in the Philippines since the 1960s, identifies major government policies that affected rural development, and explores the political economy behind such policies.

Economic development in Southeast Asia during the last few decades has generally been quite impressive compared to developing countries in other regions such as South Asia and Africa. Compared to the other two countries of this study, however, the Philippines has lagged behind Indonesia and Thailand in its efforts to improve the welfare of its people. As of 1965, for example, real per capita GDP in the Philippines (using the 1995 PPP U.S. dollars) was highest among the three countries at more than twice that of Indonesia, with Thailand closely following the Philippines (Table 1). In the late 1960s, the Philippines had the smallest share of agricultural value added in GDP among the three countries (Table 1).

Furthermore, the Philippines tended to have the best human development indicators in the early 1960s — a longer life expectancy than in Indonesia (although roughly equal to that of Thailand), the lowest infant mortality rate at almost one-half of Indonesia's rate, the highest primary school enrollment ratio, and lowest illiteracy rate among the three countries (Table 2). During the subsequent few decades, both Indonesia and Thailand not
