

However, parental grief was addressed more directly by consolation treatises, works composed of Qur²anic citations, hadith, anecdotes, and stories designed to assure the bereaved that they were not alone in their tragedy and sorrow. This accounts for what Gil²adi feels is the works' "impersonal character" (p. 86), which might more appropriately be called their "universal appeal." The consolation treatises attempt to channel the tumultuous emotions provoked by the death of a loved one into theologically and socially appropriate modes of behavior. Hence, they counsel patience and trust in God and discourage excessive outbursts of emotion, which might be construed as skepticism or ingratitude regarding the divine promise of a life in paradise after death.

Gil²adi is to be congratulated on shedding light on this little known genre of Arabic consolation literature, and this section is certainly original and thought provoking. However, his discussion might have been even more interesting if he had compared this literature to the large body of consolation tracts composed in the post-Civil War United States, of which Gil²adi seems totally unaware (p. 12) (see Ann Douglas, "Heaven Our Home: Consolation Literature in the Northern United States," American Quarterly 26 [1974]).

Unfortunately, this section ends with a tedious and highly speculative discussion of possible pre-Islamic child sacrifice and post-Islamic instances of infanticide. Yet, despite several weak essays and occasional oversights (children were sometimes given tombstones; elegies for children were far more common than Gil²adi seems to suggest), Children of Islam will serve as a useful reference work for Islamicists and historians interested in the subject, particularly given Gil²adi's extensive notes and bibliography, which account for over 50 of the book's 175 pages.

However, for non-Arabists concerned with the history of childhood, the often technical nature of this work may prove daunting. Gil²adi might have avoided this and strengthened his book considerably had he added a chapter on the earliest major Islamic discussions of children (particularly in medical works), placed his essay on tahnik in an appendix, and blended his final two essays into a larger one on death and mourning. Finally, non-Arabists might have appreciated a full translation of al-Ghazali's section on education; the edited Arabic text is only three pages long.

REVIEWED BY MAHMOOD IBRAHIM, Department of History, California State Polytechnic University, Pomona

The connection between Islam and commerce has been as well recognized by the present generation of Islamic scholars as it was at the turn of the century. Sira and Futuhat literature are full of references to commerce, commodities, commercial institutions, and practices, that testify to the role played by merchants and their capital in Meccan society. Merchants and their capital therefore also participated in creating the conditions that led to the rise of Islam. It has become axiomatic that commerce in the region thrived to an unprecedented degree with Islam and that merchants played an important part in the region's economy and in the elaboration of Islamic culture. Simon's book Meccan Trade and Islam provides another attempt to explain why this was so.

Although much of the book was written nearly twenty years ago, it is still useful. Especially part I, which discusses the history of pre-Islamic Arabia. Simon successfully integrates the history of the Arabian peninsula into the framework of contemporary history and describes developments in the political and economic life in Arabia.
