

MEASUREMENT OF THE SPECIFIC RESISTANCE OF Cu-Ga ALLOYS AT HIGH TEMPERATURES

K. THÖRMER, H. COUFAL, G. FRITSCH, H. DILETTI

Physik Department E17, Technische Universität München, D 8046 Garching, Germany

Received 3 March 1976

The specific resistance of Cu-Ga alloys is determined by a four-point dc-method. Samples from zero to one hundred atomic percent concentration of gallium in copper were measured from their melting temperature up to 1450 K.

To complete resistivity measurements of the binary copper alloys [1] and for comparison with NMR-Knight shift measurements on Cu-Ga alloys [2], the resistivity of these Cu-Ga alloys has been measured.

The experimental set-up included a horizontal furnace containing the sample, standard equipment for dc-resistance measurements and PtRh-Pt thermocouples for temperature measurements. For the resistance measurements, a dc current of one ampere from an HP 6961A power supply passed through a calibrated 10 Ω precision resistor connected in series with the sample. Using a high resolution DVM Type Prema 5020, the voltage drops are compared. The error in the resistance measurement can be neglected compared to the error of the geometry factor leading to an overall error of the specific resistivity below 1.5 percent. The furnace consisted of two concentric alumina tubes of 50 cm length and an inner diameter of 7.5 cm and 10 cm, respectively. The outer tube, the heater, was wound with 45 turns of Megapyr I. This material with a rectangular 0.3 \times 3 mm cross section allowed sample temperatures up to 1450 K. The inner tube is vacuum sealed. It was under normal experimental conditions filled with argon at a pressure of 2 bar to prevent the evaporation of gallium at high temperatures [3].

The samples were prepared by filling pieces of copper wire and gallium grains — both 99.999% purity refined by Demetron — corresponding to the desired concentration into a ceramic crucible. The samples were alloyed and outgassed for up to two hours in high vacuum at temperatures in the order of 1450 K. Inside the crucible, the molten alloy filled a suitably shaped channel defining the geometry of the sample. Four tungsten electrodes of 0.3 mm diameter fixed within this groove formed the electrical contacts. The distance of the current electrodes was in the order of 60 mm, whereas, the voltage electrodes were about 40 mm apart. The cross sections of the samples were circular, approximately 4 mm in diameter. The geometry of the arrangement was calibrated each time before sample preparation by measuring the resistance of a mercury sample at 300 K.
