As the history of war correspondence shows, journalists generally play a highly supportive role in wartime, often acting as little more than a conduit for official propaganda. During the 1999 Kosovo conflict, for example, the media offered enthusiastic support, with few questions asked – until months after the war – about the reasons for and results of NATO's 'humanitarian' bombing campaign (Hammond, 2000). This emphasis on image is a response to the lack of any political vision which can inspire loyalty and enthusiasm. Yet it ultimately serves only to exacerbate the problem, encouraging distrust of coalition claims and cynicism about the purpose and objectives of the war.

During the invasion of Iraq 'embedded' reporters produced much dramatic real-time footage of the rapid coalition advance, but the military did not always command the loyalty of the journalists travelling with them. One embedded photographer working for the New York Times Magazine, for instance, gave an interview to Le Monde (12
