Along the Road Lutz Klassen, 2014-10-27 This volume takes a new look at causewayed enclosures in South Scandinavia based on a research area restricted to the Djursland Peninsula in eastern Jutland The Djursland Peninsula in eastern Jutland was selected as region of concentration because of the richness of the region in terms of megalithic graves and burial mounds and because it has the largest number by far of known Neolithic enclosures within the northern TRB Group distribution area Given that the awareness of as many enclosures as possible is necessary in any attempt to evaluate their significance for Neolithic societies within a given area a major part of this work is devoted to the development of predictive modelling for the detection of enclosures in the landscape It is only in relation to this step that it is possible to engage with such questions as the reasons for which certain locations were chosen as enclosure sites and how these relate to the history of Neolithic settlement within the wider region The latter is at the heart of practically all settlement archaeological studies of the period under consideration in South Scandinavia However it has never been critically reviewed nor tested by comparisons with the results from other regions A separate section is devoted to examining the European dimension of the Scandinavian enclosures in closer detail
