

OCTAVIA HILL

It is moving, after reading Miss Moberly Hill's account of Octavia Hill's crowded career of struggle and triumph—the homeless attack on their property, the campaign to help the poor without pauperisation, the founding of the Charity Organisation Society, the battle for Open Spaces resulting in the establishment of the Commons Preservation Society and finally of the National Trust—it is remembered that in 1822, at the age of thirteen, the little Octavia wrote despairingly: "Do you think I ever shall be able to do anything really useful?"

The biographer has admirably succeeded in presenting a living portrait—group of Octavia, her family and her friends. Her father and mother, her two sisters, her mother's father, Dr. Southwood Smith, William and Mary Weston, Frederick Denison Maurice and the Christian Brothers—the George Washington, and most powerful of all, John Ruskin—these were the moulding influences of Octavia's youth and the rest of her life a figure revered and loved by thousands in every class of society and walks of life.

SIR REGINALD HOWE (President of The National Federation of Housing Societies) says in his Foreword:

"It is high time and the right time for the full story of the life of Octavia Hill to be published. After long association with housing questions in this country, I am fully convinced that the best of all that is now being done for the better housing of the poor has had for its origin and inspiration the life work of this remarkable Englishwoman."

"Octavia Hill was completely unselfish and had incomparable courage both physical and moral. She walked bravely and unswerving in 'Lancet,' shocked by the gulf, and was never deterred by failure. 'It is no failure,' she said, 'that failures are built.'"

"The story of Octavia Hill should be known to the young generation of every class and should be thoroughly studied by those who believe that in the progress of our country the lives of the modest men and women are the national contribution to greatness."
