

or religious belief in general is rational or irrational; but this line of thought is not open to him granted his framework of p. 109. It is a pity that he does not see the potentiality of the analogy between religious experience/belief and sense perception/perceptual belief.

MICHAEL DURRANT

William C. Bier (Ed.). Psychological Testing for Ministerial Selection. (Fordham University Press, 1970.) $8.50.

Interest in the topic to which this book is devoted is at present growing in this country. For the first time this summer, an interdenominational meeting has been planned to discuss issues and methods concerning what psychological and other professional methods can possibly contribute to questions touching ministry candidacy and formation. The present work is a report of a meeting like this held in the U.S. in 1966, at which a small number of highly qualified psychiatrists, psychologists, clergy and ministers of several denominations, all members of the Academy of Religion and Health, gathered to review their use of these methods. Between them they could look back on twenty years of experience and research, to which the work of the Editor in the late 1940s made a notable contribution.

There seems no doubt from the general tenour of the conclusions of this meeting that the use of psychological tests and interviews more usually before, but sometimes also after, first admission to ministry candidacy, has justified the pains that have been devoted to its development. There is little doubt that tests will go on being used, at least as one among an increasing number of resources available to help candidates towards a productive ministry. Although many questions arise that are hard to answer thoroughly, like those touching the validation of the tests in use, enough critical and positive evidence is available to support their further use. At the conference there were reports of two validation studies of this kind (Carroll [1968] and Weisgerber [1968]) which are perhaps the technically fullest that have yet appeared. Both have something positive to say for the methods they investigate. And if the results they report are more slender than might have been hoped, it is well to recall that modern test methods are herein being subjected to a rigorous questioning of a kind that more traditional methods of candidate selection and formation were always spared.

One of the major contributions to this work is the factual review by the Presbyterian contributor E. S. Golden on psychological problems of clergy. While this topic is one of much concern to those of all denominations, here as well as abroad, this concern is not always as well informed as it is sometimes intense. This paper goes far towards making good this imbalance and,
