

Folk Education: Resurrecting Roots of Adult and Experiential Learning Theory

by Chris Spicer

Words are too often inadequate. We understand folk music or art or dance to be music or art or dance of the folk. Folk education then, should mean education of the folk. More often, however, the name is interpreted as education about the folk (particularly about their music, art, and dance), which to make matters a little confusing, it also is—and much more. It is learning about language, history, society, identity, and change. Yet, it is characterized not only by this folk content, but more importantly, by a process which some claim, in its theoretical form, has been the basis for adult and experiential learning models.

It may seem presumptuous to make such claims, yet recent publications raise the suggestion. David Stewart's Adult Learning in America: Eduard Lindeman and his Agenda for Lifelong Education (1987), examines the Danish roots of the "father of adult education" and his educational ideas. More recently, Clay Warren (1989) of the George Washington University Department of Communications focused on these connections in his article "Andragogy and N.F.S. Grundtvig: A Critical Link."

Danish roots? N.F.S. Grundtvig? Folk Education? In the short space of this article, I will attempt to provide a theoretical overview of folk education (particularly as espoused by Grundtvig), describe the link Warren has researched between folk education and mainstream adult education theory, discuss the common ground between these and experiential learning theories, and finally, conclude with thoughts about what role folk education might play in the on-going efforts to bridge theory and practice in conventional "qualifying" education.

Folk Education

Folk education refers to a variety of student-centered, non-formal, learning programs. It is closely related to similar forms with different names: popular adult, liberal adult (especially as practiced in Finland), emancipatory and liberatory (Freire, Horton, etc.) education. It is exemplified by Scandinavian "folkehojskole" (folk high school) and study circles, but also by a variety of discussion groups, library programs, and residential retreat settings.

A central characteristic of folk education is its emphasis on student control over the learning agenda, leaving "experts" as resources, and not as officials to determine what constitutes the educated person.

Folk high schools, for example, are residential "schools for life" first created in mid-nineteenth century Denmark. They are primarily attended by young adults in their late teens and early twenties who are looking for "time-out" from more traditional study tracks to learn about their own identity through a deeper understanding of their cultural heritage. This search into their culture is coupled with explorations into their future roles in society. The schools offer both long (four to eight months) and short (one or two week) courses. Core subjects include a broad range of the humanities and the arts alongside concentrations ranging from music, arts, and sports, to ecology and international affairs. The schools offer no examination or credit, but instead make use of the intensive learning community where students and teachers, freed from the power differential created by traditional roles, evolve a democratically-run structure of classes, social activities, and living functions. Today, there are over
