

There was always a call at Taylor's Butter Factory for ice in summer; ice for the home ice chest with its drip tray beneath which treacherously overflowed at every opportunity.

The Butter Factory was an awesome place with great churns that spun and produced gargantuan slabs of butter from the cream that came from the farms on the cream lorries. It was always a rush to get the cream can out for the lorry. We had an Alfa Laval separator that separated cream and milk and whined in Scandinavian fury as it did so.

Then it was home over the Overway Bridge by the Gawler Railway Station. The bridge had galvanised iron fencing that hid the railway beneath. One story said the iron was there so that the horses wouldn't be frightened by the splendid engines that passed in a rush of steam and coal smoke.

So homewards, past the Gawler Blocks with its little school, scene of famous euchre card nights, past various dwellings. My mother knew most of the people particularly the idiosyncratic ones. She cared for people.

She stopped the car one day when an elderly person, a noted religious stalwart, was walking steadfastly in the heat.

"Can I give you a ride?" my mother asked.

"I am walking for Salvation," said the person.

"God bless you, and shouldn't we all," said my mother.

Then onwards to the familiar trees and broad paddocks of Angle Vale where my father's horse team laid a slow wake of dust with the obligatory dog trailing behind.

"How was Gawler?," he'd say, coming home dusty and tired after feeding his horses, "And what's on at the Regal, tomorrow night?"

Ginger Rogers and Fred Astaire? Then we'll go . . . the Regal, smelling of sweet disinfectant and with the Gawler aristocracy sitting in the dress circle and the Jaffa and Eskimo Pie eaters noisy in the front stalls.

Friendly Friday was nearly over. I put aside my homework essay in the evening and went outside. A benign moon rode over the ranges, our Freelite generating plant beat the night air with singing blades. Gawler's lights twinkled in the distance.

Good old Gawler, my provincial capital. Home of Stonie ginger beer and steak and kidney pies and the artistic delights of the Regal cinema.

How I loved Gawler. And more than 50 years on, how I still do!
