

11. Scientific Basis Of Osteopathy

Osteopathy is based on the basic medical sciences (anatomy, physiology, neurology, biomechanics, biochemistry, pathology). These fundamental medical sciences are applied in case history, examination and osteopathic treatment.

Relations between the treated body regions and the complaint area are explained by known interactions in the allopathic medicine: neurological, vascular and mechanic.

11.1. Mobility

Osteopathy understands that a disturbed mobility in single joints can bring soft tissues like muscles, capsules, ligaments under stress. This stress can be stretch, trophical changes, bad circulation). Disturbed mechanics means in osteopathy that the normal axis of mobility are not followed. This can be the origin of:

- overstretch of soft tissues,
- bad vascularisation in retractive soft tissues,
- cartilage disformation by changes in the axis of mobility....arthrosis, degeneration.

The disturbed mechanics in a joint often finds its origin in dysfunctions in other joints, further away. FE a foot that doesn't follow the correct biomechanics in walking because of a blockage (after inversion trauma) can influence the mechanics of the lower back and cause complaints and degeneration. (Ref.: Fairbank et al 1984, Häkkinen 2005, Schulte et al 2005) a somatic dysfunction is a disturbed or modified function of somatic related components (skeleton, joints and myofascial structures) and their vascular, lymphatic and neurological elements.

11.2. Somatic Dysfunction

A somatic dysfunction can be traced with manual methods because the modified muscle structure, capsules, ligamentary structures and raised periosteal sensibility can be palpated. The neurological relation between sclerotom, dermatom, myotom, angiotom and viscerotom has been proven and is used in traditional medicine, frequently under the name "referred pain". This interaction between the body areas is differentiated in traditional medicine as viscerosomatic, somatovisceral, viscerovisceral and somatosomatic relations. In other words this means that the cause of a complaint is not always in the complaint region but can be in different related body areas.

This is the reason why the osteopath frequently checks body structures (with palpation, provocation tests and mobility tests) away from the complaint structure but neurological, vascular, mechanical or metabolic related.

If mobility, neurological and vascular situation can be improved in the related structures, one also sees that the complaint structure improves.

11.3. Vascularisation

In allopathic medicine, disturbed circulation is also recognized as possible cause of complaints. Ischemic pain, migraine and lots of other affections are caused by circulatory problems. When the osteopath can alter the tone of the arteries, the drainage through veins and lymph vessels through treatment of the segmental elements, the complaint structure will have a better vascularisation. In allopathic medicine the same is done through medication.
