

Regenerative Agriculture: Principles and Practices

ARTICLE ID: 33

Introduction

Regenerative agriculture is a holistic, integrative approach evolving set of practices that encompass several soil health supportive techniques, targeting to improve productivity, environmental quality, and soil carbon sequestration. Rodale (1983) defined regenerative agriculture as an integrative system of producing more food using as few resources as possible at the same time revitalizing the productive capacity of the soil and sequestering carbon. Regenerative Agriculture is quite simple: it is any form of farming, i.e. the production of food or fibre, which at the same time improves the environment. This primarily means regenerating the soil. The Regenerative agriculture systems have their origins in organic farming systems. The narrative found in sustainable agriculture, organic farming, and ecosystem-based agriculture systems does not address the full extent of the challenges the world is facing with food, carbon emissions and resilience of production systems. Higher resilience of agricultural systems supported by requisite soil amendments reduces dependence on external synthetic inputs over time and ensures increase in production capacity. The increase in production does not lead to negative externalities on the farmland and biocides accumulation in agricultural produce.
