

PITCH FEEDBACK

Very little criticism was given of my idea for 'The Basement', leading me to the conclusion that I will continue with the majority of my ideas. However, one comment stated that the film leans too heavily on its influences with The Conjuring and Insidious, and I have taken this comment into great consideration. Similarities that have been adhered/radiated include:

1. The emphasis on the basement that is prominent during the final scenes of The Conjuring. Although great emphasis will be placed on the basement during 'The Basement', the pivotal scene will not take place there as it does in The Conjuring. Instead, it will take place in the third floor bedroom, and will involve the protagonist getting sucked into an all-consuming black substance.
2. The concept of the demons and 'multiple entities' that Insidious offers. These will indeed be utilised in 'The Basement' but the aesthetic and identity of the entities will be very different. Moreover, the concept of 'astral projection' and the idea of the entities living there in Insidious will not be present in my film, lending more realism and humanity to the hauntings and increasing the chance of viewers finding the horror relatable (and all the more terrifying).
3. The directorial influence of the director of these, James Wan. Initially, I hoped to mimic his tendency for handheld camera movements and slow panning shots, but in order to distance myself from his work even further, I hope to adopt a more individual style inspired by directors such as Kubrick and Paul Thomas Anderson. Shots will mainly be still and will endure for longer than expected in order to enhance the potency of the imagery on screen. Greater emphasis will be placed on using colours as stimuli.
4. The shock ending of Insidious. 'The Basement' will not have a shock ending so much as an ending propelled by dread and slow-burning horror in a series of slow fades as Joe drifts towards the devil.

Indeed, it has provoked me to reconsider the majority of the first half of the trailer, which will be constructed in a more unconventional sense than most horror film trailers. Although establishing shots will be used, there will be a greater emphasis on generating an atmosphere completely unique to the aesthetic of my film – and this will replace lengthy character introductions that were previously in its place. This will shift focus from a character-driven narrative to an atmospheric, visually complex narrative, which is a significant change from the more conventional ideas associated with my first draft of the trailer. I feel as though this change is necessary in order to
