Yields of Eastern White Pine in New England Related to Age, Site, and Stocking William B. Leak, 1970 S2The Universities of Maine Massachusetts and New Hampshire in cooperation with the Northeastern Forest Experiment Station initiated in 1959 60 a study of the effects of site and stocking on the growth of eastern white pine The primary purposes of the study were to develop equations for 1 predicting the volume increment per acre of pure even aged white pine stands from observable characteristics of the stand soil and topography and 2 predicting the increment of individual white pine trees related to characteristics of the tree stand and site By 1965 measurements of stand growth and development for a 3 year period were available from nearly all field plots A preliminary analysis revealed that one or more additional remeasurements should be taken before a final summary of the periodic growth of trees and stands is made Nevertheless useful and accurate relationships were developed between stand yield or volumes per acre and stand age site and stocking and this information is presented in this paper Yield tables based on the plot data from New Hampshire using stand height in place of age and site index have been published by Barrett and Allen 1966 S3 Bulletin ,1917 Research Paper SO ,1977 Proceedings for the Eight Biennial Southern Silvicultural Research Conference M.
