
Managing Knowledge for Innovation: Production, Process and Practice

Jacky Swan

Warwick Business School, University of Warwick

Abstract: This chapter aims to provide a review and critique of shifts in dominant ways of thinking about the relationship between knowledge management and innovation, both in terms of the assumptions they make about knowledge (and knowledge management) and the assumptions they make about innovation processes. Thus, three broad perspectives, referred to here as “production,” “process,” and “practice” perspectives are contrasted. These perspectives are outlined briefly below and illustrated, in the chapter, by drawing from examples from our IKON (Innovation, Knowledge and Organizational Networks) Research Centre. In contrasting these perspectives, I argue, not that one or other is necessarily superior, but rather that each has its own set of assumptions, and limitations, regarding the nature of knowledge and innovation. Viewing the knowledge management through these different lenses makes it possible to rethink the paradoxes and tensions around attempts to manage knowledge in innovation contexts.

1 Introduction

The need for innovation is frequently seen as a key objective for the development of Knowledge Management (KM) theory and practice. Accordingly, a growing amount of research has attempted to articulate the relationship between the management of knowledge and effects on innovation. For example, Nonaka’s (1994) now widely cited work emphasized the need for “knowledge creating companies” to manage the conversion of knowledge from one type to another (tacit to explicit). Similarly, more recent literature on “dynamic capabilities” highlights the importance of developing and managing learning mechanisms focused on “experience accumulation,” “knowledge codification,” and “knowledge articulation” in order to generate and modify operating routines in the pursuit of organizational innovation and improved competitiveness (Zollo and Winter, 2002). Indeed, the links between knowledge and innovation, and the virtue of knowledge management for improving innovation are rarely questioned in the literature, to the extent that knowledge has even been roughly equated with innovation (—hence
