

Managing Human Service Organizations

Christian Jacobsson

Introduction

The core issue in all organizations is to coordinate individual behavior on all levels in order to reach one or more common goals. This can be done indirectly through strategy and structure for the organization or directly by, for instance, leadership and incentives that affect individuals' ways of working. Organizational goals, strategies, structures and individuals' behavior contributing to organizational performance are the parts that, appropriately linked, together have a major influence on organizational effectiveness. This thesis addresses the topic of management in human service organizations (HSO) (Hasenfeld, 1983), including managing strategy, structure and individual behavior. The organizations in focus are hospitals, schools and social service agencies. A basic assumption is that human services are organizations that mostly share the features of modern organizations in general, but also confront special demands and prerequisites that make them partly different from other types of organizations. According to Hasenfeld (1983), human services are distinguished from other types of organizations by two key characteristics: they work directly with and on people whose attributes they attempt to shape and they are mandated to protect and promote the welfare of the people they serve. Both organizational management, in general, and the managing of human services, specifically, will be considered throughout this introduction.

Traditionally, there is a "top-down" relationship between the parts in the ideal chain of relationships from organizational goals to performance. Organizational strategies are, by definition, different ways of attaining organizational goals and in that sense "goal demand strategy". Further, Chandler (1962) noted in a historical analysis of the survival of organizations that the organizational structure must fit with the organizational strategy for the organization to be effective. In other words, "strategy gives structure" (i.e., structure follows strategy, in Chandler's words). The purpose of creating and maintaining an organizational structure is to influence and regulate the behavior of individual employees (Jacobsen & Thorsvik, 1998); in other words, "structure guides behavior". Lastly, organizational performance is mainly the result of the workers' behavior, thus the final step becomes "behavior creates performance". Thus, from the top to the bottom the chain becomes: "goal demands strategy, strategy gives structure, structure guides behavior and behavior creates performance". This chain serves as a model of thought, mainly to structure

Human Service Organizations and the Question of Impact
Jennifer E. Mosley, Steven Rathgeb Smith, 2020-06-29
This volume offers empirically based insights and findings on the question of how human service organizations are reacting to the increasing need for greater impact, effectiveness, and performance. As demand for increased impact outstrips our knowledge of how best to achieve these goals, the book's contributors discuss the innovative strategies being used to ensure that multiplex goals are being met and the degree to which client and staff concerns are being sacrificed for the organizational bottom line. Taken together, these discussions demonstrate that specific management strategies and collaboration based on trust and consideration of mission may help improve the quality of some services; however, many of the pressures which organizations and managers experience are resulting in lower staff morale, compromised missions, and inefficiencies. This book will be of interest to those researching human service agencies as well as those with a broader concern for how organizations react to doing more with less. This book was originally published as a special issue of the Human Service Organizations journal.

Human Service Organizations in Times of the COVID-19 Hillel Schmid, Itay Greenspan, 2025-05-09

The pandemic is described as a disruptive extreme event that has resulted in extensive and intolerable physical, psychological, and material consequences for members and clients within human service organizations. The chapters in this volume highlight the need for organizations to strengthen their resilience, adapt to changing external circumstances, and continue to serve their missions effectively. They address the implications of a health and social pandemic on economic resilience, changes in work technologies, therapeutic intervention programs, human resources, organizational structure, and social media tools used by human service organizations. The eleven chapters of this volume cover seven countries representing diverse socio-political, cultural, and economic systems, ranging from the USA and the UK to Austria, Bangladesh, China, and Israel. The perspectives presented in these chapters offer a significant contribution to theory, research, and practice in the management of human service organizations during times of disruptive extreme events.
