

overview of the history and philosophy of vocabulary control, it serves admirably. But those deciding whether or not to use a controlled vocabulary or already involved in the construction of one will find Lancaster's first edition or Soergel's Indexing Languages and Thesauri [2] better suited to their needs.

Managing Online Reference Services. Edited by Ethel Auster. New York: Neal-Schuman, 1986. 408 p. $35.00.

Managing Online Reference Services consists of twenty-six papers that address administrative issues in online services. Many were originally published in journals such as RQ, Information Technologies and Libraries, and Online Review between 1975 and 1984. Most major authors in the field of online services, including Martha E. Williams, Carol Tenopir, and F. W. Lancaster, are represented here. The compilation was initially prepared as a reader for graduate students in library science. Its intended audience also includes librarians and information professionals who are planning, initiating, or evaluating online search services within their organizations. The examples presented in Managing Online Reference Services are drawn mostly from academic and public libraries. Only one paper, "Estimating the Satisfaction of Information Users," by Renata Taglia-cozzo, is reprinted from the Bulletin of the Medical Library Association.

The chapters are grouped into eight major sections. They cover initial planning for online services, selection of vendors and databases, and staff training, in addition to promotion, costs, evaluation, and impact of online services. A section on microcomputers and software is also included. Each of the eight sections opens with a brief introduction highlighting issues to be covered and concludes with a list of suggested readings. For instance, the introduction to Part 6 reviews the types of statistics collected by online administrators, the issues in measuring user satisfaction, and the problems preventing objective evaluation of online search services. A list of twelve suggested readings follows the four papers in this section. Unfortunately, some of the introductions are little more than summaries of the material that follows.

As a compilation of papers on administrative issues in online services, the book presents a nice range of logically grouped readings. Two important themes link these groups together into a comprehensive whole. These themes are the identification of the need for an online as opposed to a manual search and the integration of online and reference functions into a single public service. The book is well-indexed; it contains both a subject and personal name index. The name index includes chapter authors, individuals mentioned in the text of articles, and authors cited in footnotes and suggested readings. The two strongest sections of the book are Parts 3 and 6, which discuss the identification, training, and evaluation of good online searchers and the analysis and evaluation of online statistics and services. The chapters in these sections are timely, uniformly excellent, and applicable to all types of libraries. Marcia J. Bates' "The Fallacy of the Perfect Thirty-Item Online Search," reprinted in Part 6, should be read by all searchers, both novice and experienced. Thomas S. Warrick's "Large Databases, Small Computers and Fast Modems . . . An Attorney Looks at the Legal Ramifications of Downloading" outlines areas of possible copyright infringement for searchers who are downloading information from commercial database vendors.

Not all of the articles are the same high quality as Bates' and Warrick's. Some, such as Walt Crawford's "VDT Checklist: Another Look at Terminals," are too practical and detailed for an administrative book with the stated purpose of avoiding "overly specific situations." Others contain outdated information. References to searching by batch mode and a lack of document delivery support in Part 2 are no longer pertinent. Similarly, the list of software sources and packages in Carol Tenopir's "Identification and Evaluation of Software for Microcomputer-Based In-House Databases" is no longer complete.

On a broader level, some of the issues raised in certain articles are no longer relevant. Justification of online search services with the detail outlined in Jean K. Martin's chapter, "Preparation of Proposals for Online Bibliographic Services in Academic, Government, and Industrial Libraries," is probably unnecessary today. Neither do librarians today harbor the fear of marketing their services and charging user fees described in Part 4. One issue faced by today's librarians, but not addressed here,
