Although I have been teaching for almost 8 years I was very enlightened by what is required in special education inclusion practices. The first example, called mainstreaming, sounds more like the phrase "survival of the fittest" than inclusion. The idea that students must "earn" the right to stay in the class by "keeping up" makes it seem like the student does not have the right but must earn it, it is a reward. The next example, inclusion maintains that the child benefits from the commitment to educate each child to the maximum extent possible and the aspect of being included and not isolated from peers. The special services are provide for them make progress, but not necessarily to keep up. The final example requires full inclusion regardless of handicapping condition or severity.

There are two laws that provide guidance for inclusive practices. The first is the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act (IDEA). The term inclusion does not appear in the wording but the essence is with the phrase "least restrictive environment". This leads to the regular classroom. The placement begins with a committee to determine the least restrictive environment and with the maximum extent possible.

K-12 schools must address the needs of all students, regardless of disability and that all students must receive services within peer groups unless those groups are deemed inappropriate.

Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 is the other law that mandates that handicapped children must be educated in the "least restricted environment" meaning the regular classroom. This must be done unless it is demonstrated that educating in the regular classroom with the use of supplemental aides and services cannot be achieved satisfactorily.

Implications across state law

The authors cited four case laws which occurred in four different judicial districts. (Greer vs Rome City School District, 11th Circuit Court, 1992; Sacramento City Unified School District vs Holland, 9th Circuit Court, 1994; Oberti vs Board of Education of the Borough of Clementon School District, 3rd Circuit Court, 1993; and Poolaw vs Parker Unified School District, Federal District Court Arizona, 1994). Although each of these cases took place in a different judicial district, there are similarities across case law.

In the first case law decided that money could not be the deciding factor, but also said that the district did not have to provide a personal teacher. Removal from the regular classroom could only take place if all options and supplemental aides would not enable the student to succeed. The second case cited that removal could not take place without considering non-academic benefits, these are: 1) educational benefit of full time inclusion, 2) non-academic benefits, 3) the effect the child would have on peers and the teacher, 4) and the costs. The third case was very direct in stating three factors to be considered. 1) The district must make every reasonable effort to accommodate the child,
