The process involves several steps, including preclinical testing, IND application, Phase I, II, and III clinical trials, and finally, approval by the FDA. Once a drug is approved, the FDA continues to monitor its safety and effectiveness through a system called post-marketing surveillance. This system includes a variety of methods, such as spontaneous reporting, clinical trials, and surveillance of adverse events. The FDA also has the authority to withdraw a drug from the market if it is found to be unsafe or ineffective.
