Equality: Balancing the Scales

In January 1970, Joe left home for his job as a salesman, as he had done every morning for the past ten years. He had a wife, two kids, a mortgage, a car, and a cat to support.

Two years later his house was a mess, his children screaming, and his wife bored and unfulfilled. She went back to school to find herself, and Joe still went to work. Later his wife found herself, a career, and a more understanding lover. And Joe found an apartment. Now Joe pays half his salary to support the children he sees only twice a month. He still goes to work every day, but now he is called a salesperson.

Joe and some of the guys from the office meet at a bar almost every night now after work. Over a few beers, they reminisce about the good old days when men were men and women were women. They exchange wisecracks about women's lib, and everybody has a good laugh. Some of the men — the ones who still have a wife and family — watch the clock casually. When they leave, Joe feels sad and angry. He also feels lonely. But what the hell — the crazy way things are going these days, what's a guy to do?

Besides Joe, there are executives sitting alone in their offices, bitter and worried because they can't make sense out of life anymore. And carpenters, swearing as they drive in nails, trying to forget that their wives and girlfriends have left them. And lawyers who blame their failing marriages on wives who "don't know when they've got it made." And truckdrivers who plan to go to Mexico where women still understand men. And so on.
