Assembling E-Government Research Designs: A Transdisciplinary View and Interactive Approach

Recent Trends in Public Sector Technological Innovations

There is a growing recognition in the field of e-government that improving the quality and impact of research requires taking into account their complex contexts and drawing on more interdisciplinary and collaborative research. Limited attention so far has been directed toward the conduct of such research, particularly in contract-based research arrangements for developing e-government policy. A four-nation study of public e-procurement policy is used here to make transparent the process of designing and conducting transdisciplinary and interactive research. Further sharing of research designs and accounts is needed to advance theory, policy, and practice, and to develop a history of ideas in the e-government research field.

E-government research is conducted in Australia within a policy climate that increasingly is committed to an evidence-based approach. Translating evidence into the policy making process is not without challenges. The interplay of policy imperatives, diverse user needs, vested interests, and the affordances of technology represents a complex sociotechnical change in the practices of policy analyses and in the pursuit of policy research. A recent Australian Government Productivity Commission report (Banks 2009) examining the challenges of evidence-based policy making highlighted the need to discriminate between what constitutes "real" evidence, its usability and availability for informing decisions, and ensuring its credibility over every stage of the policy development process. The report emphasized the necessity to improve capacity within the public service to deliver evidence-based policy advice by engaging with consultants and academics, as well as a strong methodology to assist in understanding the process itself, focusing greater attention on research design and the interface with policy makers.

These imperatives and challenges are all the more significant for e-government research because of its multifaceted and multidirectional impact on policy and practice involving the sometimes opposing logics and perspectives of multiple stakeholders.

Notwithstanding the significant progress made in the field of e-government over the past decade, many programs and implementations have proved disappointing (Bekkers and Homburg 2007; Teo, Srivastava, and Jiang 2008; Yang and Rho 2007). Further, while there has been an increasing number of rigorous empirical studies and greater openness on the part of government agencies to participation in scholarly research (Sannarum, Henriksson, and Andersen 2006), the field of e-government research and theorizing has come under greater scrutiny, with calls for a reassessment of the research agenda.

Reviews have identified a number of limitations, which include concerns that the field may not achieve maturity because of lack of focus (Grönlund 2004; Grönlund and Anderson 2006) and limited theoretical progress, which hinders cumulative tradition (Flak, Sein, and Sæbo 2007). Further, poor use of research theory and method (Heeks and Bailur 2007) and extant models that do not accurately describe or predict development (Counsey and Norris 2008) have intensified calls for more work in translating research into practice that is evidence based and actively engaged with relevant stakeholders (Irani, Elliman, and Jackson 2007).

Rationale and Objectives

The chasm between the goals and aspirations of e-government policies and practice has heightened awareness of the need for further scholarly work that takes into account complex contexts (Bekkers and Homburg 2007; Taylor and Lips 2008), has an integrated perspective (Níchuíve 2007), and puts a greater focus on its policy relevance (Madon, Sahay, and Sudan 2007; Yıldız 2007), thus driving research in more interdisciplinary and collaborative directions (Irani, Elliman, and Jackson 2007). These drivers point to a changing research landscape that is framing the gap between theory and practice as a knowledge production problem rather than a knowledge transfer issue or a problem of viewing theory and practice as two distinct forms of knowledge.
